What have I done?

Last week I used my strong work ethic to complete almost all of my assignments a day in advance of the due date. I worked on my weakness of communication by talking to some of my coworkers, and I used my opportunity of having an extra day off to do some research on e-portfolios. The failure to success story allowed me to discover how one of my favorite actors, Harrison Ford, began his career being told he didn't have what it takes to be a movie star. I will remember his dedication to his dream by not giving up for 10 years before receiving his breakthrough role.

What am I doing?

I am currently working on my LinkedIn profile and other social media sites that I have set up. I plan on using these sites to connect with other people so I can work on my discomfort with social interaction. I have the same threat as last week of wasting the time meant for schoolwork on my days off from work. I will continue to apply my strong work ethic towards all of my assignments. I learned from the Go To Training this week that I may be writing more than necessary on my post, so I will work on that as well.

What's Next?

Next I will use some spare time to work on a game I created for the final project of SDI. It was a type of choose your own adventure game, and I would like to add some new features and include a "Play Again?" option once the game is over. I would also like to work on my social media sites and get more comfortable sharing my life online.

How to?

I will turn my weakness of communication and threat of wasting my days off into an opportunity by connecting with people through Facebook, Twitter, and LinkedIn. Just to ease myself in gradually, I will reach out to family members that already use these sites. My dad likes to see the projects I create with code and provide tips on how to improve, so this will be a good way to communicate more with him.
